 Excerpt: . . . vectors or matrices in context. The vector-matrix combination is invalid because of the ambiguity in interpretation; the vector could be expanded either as a matrix of column vectors or of row vectors. The programmer must, in order to have a vector-matrix combination, use either MATC which generates a matrix of column vectors or MATR which generates a matrix of row vectors. The MERGE function sets the elements of matrix Z equal to the corresponding elements of X, for those elements of L which are true, and to the corresponding elements of Y, for those elements of L which are false. This function can be used to implement conditional, data dependent calculations. For example, a branch instruction with two branches can be implemented by ( 1 ) calculating the results of the first branch and storing them in matrix X; ( 2 ) calculating the results of the second branch and storing them in Y; ( 3..
