Excerpt: .of men called Dikastoel, under the direction of a presiding officer or archon. They decided by vote, and were under oath, and were probably selected by lot from the body of freemen. This body, however, does not appear to have been of any regular number, and sometimes amounted to hundreds; nor do they appear to have answered only to the facts of the case. They were probably a part of the general assembly of the citizens, which all matters of public interest were decided, including the decision of disputes between individual citizens. L found in the body, with them, called the judiaes-though sometimes, THE JURY svsrnm. but a single judex passed upon the case. These judices were taken from a particular class of people-at one time from the Equestrian, at another time, the Senatorial order. They were, however, clothed with full power...
